In visual art, Video differs from film (including avant garde cinema) in its disregard for the conventions of traditional movie-making. While film producers juggle with storyline, screenplay, actors and dialogue - the basic elements of entertainment movies - the video artist is concerned with exploring the medium itself, or to use it to challenge the viewer's ideas of space, time and form.

I think a more appropriate title for the book should have been, "The History of Film and Video Art". Mainly because, as the title suggests, I was hoping for lots of examples of art found in films and videos. Instead, there is tons of text. As far as any visual art, what is printed in the book I would hardly consider art, much less inspirational ...

The differences between film and video used to be a lot greater – specifically in terms of the much greater dynamic range and resolution that film could capture. Over the past few years these have largely gone away and, in many ways, digital may actually be superior to film (though we can leave that battle to the Videomaker forum).
